This Opinion Statement of the CFE ECJ Task Force analyses the ECJ's decision in Brisal and KBC Finance Ireland (Case C-18/15) of 13 July 2016. Following a Portuguese reference for a preliminary ruling, the Court's decision provides further clarification on the permissibility of withholding taxation within the European Union. In relation to interest, the Court held that non-resident taxpayers may be subject to withholding taxes (even if comparable residents pursuing the same activity are not) but that non-residents may nevertheless not be taxed on gross income (when comparable residents are taxed on net profits) and are, therefore, entitled to deduct expenses directly connected to their business activity.

1. Background and Issues

Brisal – Auto Estradas do Litoral SA (Brisal) is a Portuguese company. In 2004, Brisal borrowed funds from a syndicate of banks. In 2005, KBC Finance Ireland (KBC) joined the syndicate. Between 2005 and 2007, Brisal paid interest to KBC. Following domestic and tax treaty rules, Brisal withheld 15% of the gross amount of interest (as Portuguese corporate income tax) and remitted it to the Portuguese tax authorities.

According to Portuguese domestic law, interest received by non-resident financial institutions is subject to a 20% final withholding tax on the gross amount. This rate may be reduced to 15% or 10%, depending on the applicable tax treaty. Interest received by resident financial institutions is not subject to any withholding but such institutions are subject to corporate tax at a rate of 25% of their net profits.

Against this background, in 2007, Brisal and KBC launched an administrative appeal to the tax authorities claiming infringement of the free movement of services, which was dismissed. They appealed to the Portuguese court: this was also dismissed. They then appealed to the Supreme Administrative Tribunal, which decided to refer the issue to the Court of Justice of the European Union (ECJ). In essence, the referring Court asked whether the freedom to provide services precludes a national regime that:

- applies withholding tax only to payments of interest to non-residents; and
- taxes non-residents on their gross profits whereas comparable residents are taxed only on a net basis.

If so, in respect of which expenses should a deduction be allowed. Specifically, it was asked whether expenses calculated on a notional basis can be deducted.

In her Opinion,<sup>1</sup> Advocate General Kokott concluded that the national legislation infringed the freedom to provide services. The infringement, however, resulted not from applying withholding tax solely to payments to non-residents but rather from the use of different tax bases and calculation methods, in particular the prohibition against non-residents deducting actual expenses directly connected with the activity generating the income being taxed.

2. The Decision of the Court

2.1. The applicable freedom

The Court's Fifth Chamber<sup>2</sup> started by noting that the facts took place before 1 December 2009 and that, accordingly, the case regarding the freedom to provide services would be judged by reference to article 49 of the EC Treaty<sup>3</sup> (and not by reference to article 56 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) (2007)).<sup>4</sup>

4. Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union of 13 December 2007, OJ C115 (2008), EU Law IBFD.

2.2. Use of different methods of taxation for residents and non-residents

The first issue was to determine whether or not applying withholding tax only in respect of non-resident financial institutions was permissible. Referring to its previous case law in Scorpio (Case C-290/04)<sup>5</sup> and X (Case C-498/10),<sup>6</sup> the Court confirmed that although such a difference in treatment would amount to a restriction, it would be justified by the need to ensure effective collection of tax.

2.3. Calculation of the tax base – net versus gross

The second (and main) issue examined by the Court was the permissibility of using a different tax base for non-resident financial institutions deriving interest from Portugal. The Court considered this a restriction on the free provision of services and rejected all arguments from the Portuguese government, both as to comparability and as to justification and proportionality.

2.3.1. Comparability

By reference to its previous case law in Gerritse (Case C-234/01),<sup>7</sup> Conijn (Case C-346/04)<sup>8</sup> and Centro Equestre da lezíria Grande (Case C-345/04),<sup>9</sup> the Court reiterated that resident and non-resident service providers are in a comparable situation in relation to the deduction of business expenses directly connected to the activity pursued. It explicitly rejected the Portuguese government's claim that financial services should be distinguished from other services based on a perceived impossibility of establishing "any characteristic link between costs incurred and interest income received". The Court pointed out that the EC Treaty does not support such a distinction and that services provided by financial institutions cannot, "as a matter of principle, be treated differently from the provision of services in other areas of activity".

2.3.2. Justification and proportionality

The Court also rejected all the justifications presented by the Portuguese government: (1) the availability of other advantages; (2) the need to preserve a balanced allocation of taxing powers; (3) the need to fight against tax evasion and prevent double deduction of business expenses; and (4) the need to ensure the effective collection of tax.

First, the advantage granted to non-resident financial institutions, i.e. the fact that a more favourable tax rate is applied to non-resident financial institutions (20% withholding tax) than that applied to resident financial institutions (25% corporate income tax), was merely potential and, as such, could not justify the restriction. Relying on

Dijkman and Dijkman-Lavaleije (Case C-233/09)<sup>10</sup> and X, the Court reiterated that an "unfavourable tax treatment contrary to a fundamental freedom cannot be regarded as compatible with EU law because of the potential existence of other advantages", specifically noting that the restriction at issue "cannot be justified by the fact that non-resident financial institutions are subject to a tax rate which is lower than the rate for resident financial institutions".

Second, the Court noted that, while the allocation of taxation powers between Member States remains for Member States to decide:<sup>11</sup>

[...] there is in the present case nothing which can explain in what way the allocation of taxation powers require[s] that non-resident financial institutions, with regard to the deduction of business expenses directly related to their taxable income in that Member State, must be treated less favourably than resident financial institutions.

Third, the Court rejected a justification based on the prevention of double deduction of business expenses, which may be linked to the fight against tax evasion, as Portugal had failed to demonstrate why the Mutual Assistance Directive (77/799)<sup>12</sup> (in force at the time of the facts) could not be used to prevent the potential risk of double deduction of the business expenses in question.

Finally, while ensuring the effective collection of tax may constitute a valid justification in light of Scorpio and X, the "restriction must still be applied in such a way as to ensure achievement of the aim pursued and not go beyond what is necessary for that purpose". The Court did not, however, find such a necessity to apply a different method to non-residents and hence concluded that the proportionality test was not met. Three issues were decisive:

- First, the Court rejected the argument that giving taxpayers with limited liability the opportunity to deduct business expenses directly related to the services provided in that territory would give rise to an administrative burden for the national tax authorities because that argument also applies, mutatis mutandis, in the case of taxpayers with unlimited liability.
- Second, an additional burden on the recipient of the service would only exist in a system that provides that that deduction must be made before withholding tax is applied; conversely, such a burden is avoided "in the case where the service provider is authorised to claim its right to deduction directly from the authorities once IRC has been levied" (i.e. receive a reimbursement of a fraction of the tax withheld at source). The Court hence hints at what might be considered a balanced system: a simple withholding procedure (in the hands of the resident service receiver) followed by a reimbursement procedure (upon the initiative of the non-resident service provider).

- Under such a system, third, it is for the service provider to decide whether or not it is appropriate to invest resources in drawing up and translating documents intended to demonstrate the genuineness and the actual amount of the business expenses that it seeks to deduct.

2.4. Expenses to be deducted

The third (and last) issue examined by the Court was “how to determine the business expenses directly related to interest income arising from a financial loan agreement”.

In analysing this issue, the Court further explained the notion of business expenses directly linked with the interest income in question, starting from the point of equal treatment: for the Court, any deductions available to residents should also be granted to non-residents carrying out the same activities. The Court also restated its own case law “that business expenses directly related to the income received in the Member State in which the activity is pursued must be understood as expenses occasioned by the activity in question, and therefore necessary for pursuing that activity”.

The Court then considered loans specifically and clarified which expenses would meet that criterion. These would be (1) specific expenses (“such as travel and accommodation expenses, legal or tax advice” insofar as they are also granted to residents), and (2) apportionable general expenses or overhead (including “the fraction of the general expenses of the financial institution that may be regarded as necessary for the granting of a particular loan”).

The Court recognized that it might be more difficult with regard to business expenses of a non-resident to show genuineness and a link with the relevant business activity. Nonetheless, as these can be accepted for residents, they cannot be (a priori) denied to non-residents. By reference to the previous decisions in Persche (Case C-318/07)<sup>13</sup> and in Kohll and Kohll-Schlessler (Case C-300/15),<sup>14</sup> the Court stressed that tax authorities are free to require sufficient evidence to prove that the expenses are directly connected with the activity in question.

In computing business expenses, only real costs can be considered (provided that the system applicable for residents is also limited to real costs). The Court explicitly refused the deduction of costs calculated on a notional basis, as claimed by Brisal and KBC Ireland in the main proceedings, i.e. calculating the overhead by reference to indexes such as those provided by Euribor or Libor. Besides the fact that domestic lenders cannot calculate their deductions on that basis, the Court pointed out that KBC Ireland did not fund this specific loan solely with funds received from its parent company or other banks, but also with funds obtained from its clients. The decision on which specific costs should be considered to have a direct link with the activity, based on domestic law, was left to the referring Court.

The court further stated that the administrative burden “may therefore be avoided in the case where the service provider is authorised to claim its right to deduction directly from the authorities once IRC has been levied. In such a case, the right to deduct will take the form of a reimbursement of a fraction of the tax withheld at source”.

2.5. Conclusion

The Court concluded by summarizing the answers to the three questions brought by the Portuguese Supreme Administrative Court, holding as follows:

Therefore, in light of all the foregoing considerations, the answer to the questions referred for a preliminary ruling is that:

- Article 49 EC does not preclude national legislation under which a procedure for withholding tax at source is applied to the income of financial institutions that are not resident in the Member State in which the services are provided, whereas the income received by financial institutions that are resident in that Member State is not subject to such withholding tax, provided that the application of the withholding tax to the non-resident financial institutions is justified by an overriding reason in the general interest and does not go beyond what is necessary to attain the objective pursued;
- Article 49 EC precludes national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which, as a general rule, taxes non-resident financial institutions on the interest income received within the Member State concerned without giving them the opportunity to deduct business expenses directly related to the activity in question, whereas such an opportunity is given to resident financial institutions;
- it is for the national court to assess, on the basis of its national law, which business expenses may be regarded as being directly related to the activity in question.

3. Comments

The present case represents a step further in a sequence of cases addressing the compatibility of withholding taxes with the fundamental freedoms, such as Scorpio, Truck Center (Case C-282/07),<sup>15</sup> Commission v. Portugal (Case C-105/08),<sup>16</sup> X, Hirvonen (Case C-632/13)<sup>17</sup> and Miljoen (Joined Cases C-10/14, C-14/14 and C-17/14).<sup>18</sup> When Truck Center was decided, some interpreted it as carte blanche for Member States to apply different systems of tax collection for residents and non-residents. With Miljoen, Hirvonen and Brisal, however, it became clear that even if a different method of tax collection for residents and non-residents is justified, that does not automatically permit differences in the tax base or other features.

Commission v. Portugal was an infringement procedure relating to the same legislation as that at issue in Brisal. The Court considered that the Commission had failed to show how the withholding method would lead to a more disadvantageous position for non-resident financial institutions (as it merely raised hypothetical examples instead of relying on actual data). In Brisal, as there was a specific taxpayer, it could, in principle, show a real difference in treatment. Curiously, neither the Advocate General's Opinion, nor the Court's decision explicitly mentions the calculations that evidenced that restriction. Therefore, one may wonder why the Court did not reach the same conclusion as in Commission v. Portugal. Both cases concerned one and the same set of rules and the CFE believes that the different decision is only due to the burden of proof imposed on the European Commission in an infringement procedure.

Also, in Brisal, the Court adopted a more generous approach towards deductibility than, for example, in Miljoen. For the Court, the key feature that allows a cost to be a deductible expense is its connection with the taxable activity. In Miljoen, regarding dividends, the financing costs needed for the acquisition of the shareholding were not considered deductible expenses, as they concerned only the ownership per se. According to Advocate General Jääskinen in that case, an expense will be considered to have a direct link if it is "necessary in order to carry out the activity which gives rise to those expenses". The shareholding is apparently not necessary to carry out the activity that produces dividends. In Brisal, for interest the situation is different. There is a direct link in respect of "financing costs which are necessary for carrying out an activity", and the Court allows directly related expenses and overhead and considers that both are necessary for the taxable activity, which is granting a loan. It is difficult to understand why the costs of holding shares should not be deductible (Miljoen) when the costs of holding loans are (Brisal). It is also curious that the Court did not even refer to Miljoen even though Advocate General Kokott discussed the relationship between the cases at length.

The direct impact of this decision should not be overestimated. Most Member States have already abolished their withholding systems for interest or grant generous exemptions. Therefore, only a few will have to revisit their interest withholding tax regimes. Nonetheless, this decision does have a deterrent effect: Member States will now be aware of the severe limitations they face when introducing such a system for the taxation of non-residents on interest.

The indirect impact of the case may be much wider. This will be considered from a taxpayer and an income perspective, taking into account the applicable freedom. In the CFE's opinion, the logic of this ruling is applicable:

- (1) not only to financial institutions but to any entity that receives interest as part of its business activities (and that, therefore, may be in a comparable position with residents being taxed on a net basis); and
- (2) to royalties: in both cases, passive income is derived from the exercise of a business activity that requires direct costs and overhead.

One may wonder what the indirect impact of Brisal is on dividends. The Advocate General clearly distinguished Miljoen and Brisal, saying that only in respect of interest would the costs related to acquiring the loan be deductible, as such costs relate to income from economic activity (whereas dividends are to be viewed as the mere consequence of holding shares). The Court followed the Advocate General's Opinion without making a clear distinction between both types of income. It remains to be seen whether, in future decisions, the Court will continue to distinguish between dividends and interest or whether, following Brisal's line of reasoning, it will consider that costs related to the acquisition of the shareholding should also be considered deductible.

Both the decision and the Advocate General's Opinion are solely based on the freedom to provide services. There are reasons to think the correct freedom might be the freedom to move capital. In an intra-EU situation, it is generally not material under which freedom a domestic measure is scrutinized. This might explain why there was no discussion of the correct freedom. In a third country scenario, it would be critical whether the free movement of capital applied. Brisal should not be taken as holding that it would not.

In conclusion, Member States wishing to maintain their withholding tax systems for non-residents without a PE have to allow for a deduction of directly connected business expenses that residents can deduct in computing their taxable profits.

It is, however, doubtful whether or not Member States could implement a straightforward refund procedure, at a later stage and in the hands of the non-resident service provider, without also giving him the option to claim such a deduction during the withholding procedure. In Scorpio, the Court held that the taxpayer must be given the possibility to deduct business expenses that are directly linked to activities in the source state as part of the withholding procedure. In Brisal, however, paragraph 42 of the decision could be interpreted as saying that the fundamental freedoms do not oblige a Member State to allow for a deduction of business expenses when calculating the withholding as long as the Member State allows the taxpayer to give effect to his right to a deduction during a subsequent refund procedure. While it is true that verification of the business expenses can be burdensome for the recipient of the services, a subsequent tax assessment will be all the more burdensome for the service provider, as he is usually not familiar with the language or the tax system of the source state. The CFE strongly urges the ECJ to follow its reasoning in the Scorpio case and require Member States to grant the service provider a choice between an immediate deduction of business expenses during the withholding procedure or a subsequent refund procedure.

The disadvantages in terms of the administrative burden on taxpayers can also be predicted. As stated in Scorpio:

[...] the obligation, even where the non-resident provider of services has informed his payment debtor of the amount of his business expenses directly linked to his activity, to commence a procedure for the subsequent refund of those expenses is liable to impede the provision of services. In that commencing such a procedure involves additional administrative and economic burdens, and to the extent that the procedure is inevitably necessary for the provider of services, the tax legislation in question constitutes an obstacle to the freedom to provide services.

The same concern regarding burden of proof was expressed in this case.

In terms of interaction with tax treaties, allowing for a deduction of business expenses does not convert this interest income into business profits (article 7 of the OECD Model (2014)).<sup>19</sup> The interest income will still fall under the definition in article 11(2) of the OECD Model and article 7(4) grants precedence to article 11, unless there is a PE in the source state (article 11(4) of the OECD Model).

4. The Statement

The CFE welcomes the clarification made by the Court regarding the operation of withholding tax on interest paid to non-residents. It is now unambiguous that, despite authorizing the application of such a method (if justified and proportional), the Court considers that resident and non-resident service providers are comparable and that a deduction for expenses granted to residents should be made available to non-residents.

19. OECD Model Tax Convention on Income and on Capital (26 July 2014), Models IBFD.

The CFE stresses that Member States wishing to keep (or to introduce) withholding tax systems need to take into account not only the substantive tax result of allowing a deduction but also need to ensure that non-residents are not discriminated against with regard to proving the expenses. The CFE also welcomes the fact that the taxpayer is being given the option of whether or not to apply such a system because this allows it to take into account compliance costs in making this decision.

The CFE recommends that advisors within its member organizations revisit the situation with their clients and advise them on whether to file protective claims not only in cases falling directly within the scope of the decision but in relation to all withholding taxes, as described in this Opinion Statement, where the same rationale seems applicable.
